Alberto Aguilar's first large scale survey explores how the Chicago-born and based artist's various life roles and surroundings have shaped a searching, inquisitive practice that is grounded in, and produces, a radical everyday. Aguilar's creative work often incorporates whatever materials he has at hand and has extended into collaborations and exchanges with others, including his own family. His systems-based processes build into their own monumentality, hinting at the broader implications of the deeply democratic ethos at the heart of Aguilar's work.
