Gallery 400 at the University of Illinois Chicago is pleased to announce The Mask of Prosperity, a group exhibition that takes shape around the role inheritance has across multiple dimensions of our lives. Inheritance is commonly understood as a will, a promise of ownership that ensures the passing down and accumulation of property and capital from one generation to the next. For many, this topic strikes a personal chord, demanding reflection on our relationships with ancestors and what we would like to endow our descendants with. Expanding on this strand of thinking, The Mask of Prosperity, curated by Gallery 400 Assistant Director Denny Mwaura, is posed as an inquiry that probes the tensions between which legacies we choose to acquire, hold on to, or reject across culture and personal life.

The featured artists present a spectrum of reflections interrogating how legacies linked to language, property, social movement, and moral principles intensify to possibly build a prosperous life. A central concern in the exhibition is, how do we come into possession of material and intangible things and what are their lasting impressions on determining our sense of self? The scenes of life collected and animated in the exhibition capture intimate pursuits to parse out unfinished business with loss, grief, past, present, and future. These scenes, born from the artists' keen observation of their kinship structures, political environments, and private lives, are rendered into a mirror in which we can recognize inheritance's meaning and value in our lives.

Newly commissioned contributions by Caroline Kent and Nate Young, Eli Greene, Katherine Simóne Reynolds, Gabrielle Octavia Rucker, and S*an D. Henry-Smith emerged from conversations with these artists over the past two years. Artists and spouses Caroline Kent and Nate Young present a collaborative installation that holds a legacy of their dedication to an uncompromising work ethic embedded in their practices. The work traces back to both their family's prior generations and functions as an archive of photographs, documents, and works from their oeuvres that they will pass down to their children. Katherine Simóne Reynolds meditates on her parents' marriage, their divorce, her father's death, and her inheritance through opaque and transparent display approaches that reveal the existence of a predatory industry that preys on and profits off estate heirs. Cameron Clayborn's cell-like sculpture utilizes architectural materials and draws from their childhood memories in their grandmother's house in Malvern, Arkansas, to consider its importance in forming their Black, femme, and Southern identity. Eli Greene's installation of light boxes offers a resting place for family photographs, drawings, and found objects, giving them new purposes that never lose connections to their origins. S*an D. Henry Smith's photographs of spaces they have lived between New York City, London, and Amsterdam attribute inheritance to a sense of wandering and displacement related to the Middle Passage. Gabrielle Octavia Rucker's asemic writing—an abstract and intuitive calligraphic writing form—and its translation into the Latin alphabet examines the loss of one's language and sense of home due to systemic poverty.

Artists Sonya Clark, Bouchra Khalili, and Carmen Winant's works are anchored by how our lived conditions today are indebted to social movements and revolutionary thought that imagine a prosperous life beyond what the present avails. Clark's works grapple with the immeasurable wealth acquired by Western nations during the transatlantic slave trade and how African Americans have expressed self-determination and liberation through the resonant musicality of the hymn “Lift Every Voice and Sing.” With the recent overturning of Roe v. Wade in the United States, Carmen Winant’s photographic assemblages center the behind-the-scenes work in Midwestern health clinics and abortion clinics, making visible lateral forms of kinships and transmission of knowledge born from care and feminist traditions. Bouchra Khalili’s politically salient video trilogy, The Speeches Series, chronicles the lives of immigrants in the United States and Europe, addressing their labor and belonging struggles and personal alignment with writing from radical thinkers such as Malcolm X and Édouard Glissant. The unfolding narratives in The Mask of Prosperity ask for a consideration of how legacies we voluntarily and involuntarily acquire transform us and their vitality to our formation of the self.
